Positionalities

Due Monday, March 2

"You can't get to know another person while pretending not to see ideology, class, race, faith, identity and any of the other fraught social categories."
-D. Brooks, How to Know a Person, P. 109

What does the above quote mean to you?

Brooks' quote suggests that truly understanding another person requires acknowledging the social forces that shape their identity, things like their race, class, gender, faith, etc. It shapes the context of who they are now and is crucial to getting to know them.

What key points stand out to you about positionalities? How does it circle back to Brooks' quote above? Is positionality part of the rhetorical situation of your hard conversation? Where in the ven diagram of the rhetorical situation does it belong?

Everyone has a social location that shapes their perspective, no one is truly neutral or objective, and our identities intersect in complex ways that influence how we see the world, which is ultimately what positionalities are. It also emphasizes self-awareness and recognizing privilege in daily interactions. Positionalities are all about acknowledging our identities and our understanding of others depends on recognizing both their positionality and our own.Positionalities provide the framework for what the quote is arguing, which is that identity and social context are essential to truly knowing someone. Our hard conversation doesn't involve identity as it is a pretty neutral topic. AI isn't a person, but a tool and our conversation is about how it is used in institutions like universities. Therefore, it wouldn't really fit in the ven diagram.

What are your positionalities? How do they differ from each other? And how will you research, dialogue, & write ethically and critically given your positionalities?

Ours differ because of the way we grew up and the different lives we live from the place we are from and our ethnicity it differs our positionalities.
